Keyboard macros for Linux can be configured in various ways. In the past, you had to type your text after installing macros in your Linux distribution's "setup" menu. Today, you can do it by using the Keyboard Macros app. This small app offers to modify three things: the modifiers, the keys to be used, and the macros. Modifiers include the volume, "shift", "ctrl", "alt", and the "stop" button. The keys to be used are the home, end, page down, and page up keys, while the macros you can specify are the two Ctrl+X shortcuts (for "cut" and "paste"), as well as Ctrl+C and Ctrl+V (for copy and paste). The main window allows you to drag and drop macros in a very simple and convenient way. You can specify a different number of macros for each modifier. You can also add and remove macros in a button-like fashion. Besides these three things, you can also choose between two layouts for the layouts in the app's window: the traditional view (with rows of different options, which could look ugly if the list of options is too long) and the minimal view (which places each option in its own cell, allowing more space). In short, Keymacro offers to configure the keyboard macros for Linux in a few simple and convenient steps.

Nextcloud Status App
Description: Nextcloud Status App is a simple app, but it packs a powerful punch. It offers to collect all the Nextcloud apps and their status into a single place. Nextcloud Status App can be used in two ways: first, it offers to display the list of the Nextcloud apps, so you can quickly access them when they are needed; second, you can easily view the stats of each app from the dedicated window. To achieve this, Nextcloud Status App offers to show the current performance of the apps, with a rating from Green to Red, while the app is online. Besides the standard performance stats (downloads, uploads, and space consumption), Nextcloud Status App can show a pie chart to display each app's current space consumption. The app is free and comes with no ads, though it does provide a modest number of storage on your Google account. If you want to get rid of the ads and don't mind spending $1.99 on Google Play, you can get the Pro version of the app which offers additional features.
