Disorders of language and communication. The present article is a review of the disorders of language and communication that have emerged within the last 25 years. Each one of the disorders listed is discussed from the theoretical perspective of a cognitive neuroscientist, focusing on specific models, assumptions, and controversies. The strengths and weaknesses of each model are discussed, as are the areas in which we are least successful in understanding how language is learned or spoken. Although we attempt to provide a balanced view, we make no claim that our perspective is correct or definitive; rather, we hope to raise awareness of, and stimulate interest in, the field, to help it advance.

'Duplex' gene sequencing--an improvement in the detection of rapid genetic disorders. A rapid detection of genetic disorders, especially in high-risk newborns, is important for the early management of patients and prevention of further neurological damage. The aim of this study was to compare the identification rate of rapid genetic disorders by using duplex gene sequencing (DGS) with that by using traditional homozygosity mapping (HM). A retrospective case-control study of DGS testing of 518 newborns with a clinical suspicion of a rapid genetic disorder. Of 507 newborns screened, 8 (1.6%) had a rapid genetic disorder: one with a mild phenotype (sporadic fatal insomnia (SFI), homozygous), three with a severe phenotype (MyD syndrome, heterozygous, two Dubowitz syndrome, homozygous), and four with a mild phenotype (RAI2, compound heterozygous, SMA type 2, compound heterozygous, and Miller-Dieker syndrome, homozygous). Eight of them (0.5%) had HM positive for the same disorder (7% detection rate, 3/500). In the SFI cohort, there were seven familial cases (1.5%), all detected with DGS, one of them being novel. Our study demonstrates that DGS is superior to HM in detecting rapid genetic disorders, especially in newborns with a severe phenotype. It allows detection of one additional family with severe outcome, which would have been missed by HM.
